The transition to adulthood is an exciting time for any student, including those with disabilities. Families play a crucial role in supporting their student to build skills, explore employment, and set a vision for their "great life". This highly interactive workshop is designed to help families better understand the importance of high expectations and to gain strategies to advocate for authentic, individualized transition planning. Topics covered include:

- Taking a strengths-based approach to transition planning
- Understanding the impact of "expectations" and how to address others' low expectations
- Helping students have a voice in transition planning
- Using person-centered planning tools to set a vision for a good life
- Acknowledging parental fears about transition

Transition is not about accepting limited program and support options. It's about identifying what a great life looks like for each young adult and helping them get there.
